What a person produces or whether they produce anything for society at all, seems to define their worth. If you're not producing, people treat you like shit. Society in general just doesn't care; the hustling rat race is all that matters.

Feeling invisible in a system that values productivity over humanity.